These volumes are published by the mother gifted author, who gently weaves into her delicate frowning history, the sad and sadism of this world, in a present a most interesting period in the history of Scotland, particularly as connected with the development of its excellent traits in the character of a description, rather of what the true Scotland should be in regeneration in these trying times when the heart is wounded in its griefs, and miseries accumulate. A delicate self-inflicted unrest and unhappy condition of the soul, and self-reliance nature, contrasting, to the light of a pure and bright spirit, battling with the stern and bitter

THE LIFE OF GENERAL SCOTT

A DEPARTURE FOR THE CITY OF MEXICO.
I am now prepared to advance upon the city Mexico. With only 8,000 men, he at once moved forward upon the road to the capital.
After a march of fifty miles of level country he reached the base of the ascending slope, the country extends to the Colima collection which the city of Mexico stands, at an elevation of 7,000 feet above the level of the of the Gulf. The road, at this point, over a sandy, and winds among the of precipitous hills.

STORMING OF CERRO GORDO.

Don Anna, who had just returned from the Buena Vista, had here collected all the bold manner, and was posted upon heights. Cannon were placed in battery the commanding eminences on both sides road. Highest above them all rose the of Cerro Gordo, strongly fortified, situated at its base by heavy stone de- On these heights, thus defended by line pieces of artillery, the Mexican had interposed himself, at the head of troops. The attack upon this apparently strong position was planned by General with masterly skill. He determined to assault it in flank and rear as well as front; and to accomplish this object he sent a road, over a country almost impassable for men and baggage, for a distance of several miles. A heavy force under General had penetrated by this road, the day before the main attack, and captured, after a struggle, a commanding height in the vicinity of Cerro Gordo. The position, however, maintained by our troops with

He at hand all the conflicts of the day, then exposed to imminent danger, met General Harney on the height of Cerro Gordo, at the time of the gallant achievement, and fully expressed his admiration of the spirit and courage displayed by him in leading the attack. The officers spoke with enthusiasm of his calm and soldierly bearing of their gallant commander, during all the dangers of the day and unintermitting discharges of the artillery from the heights while the battle raged. "We felt," the enemy was driven from the heights, totally routed, and was in full retreat along the road to Jalapa, with our pursuit following in close order, and the the most remarkable of the war, Scott took 3,000 prisoners, 4,000 stand of arms, 500 pieces of artillery; and a large quantity of munition. Santa Anna's baggage, containing wooden leg and a large sum of specie, fell into the hands of the victors. The loss of the Americans in killed and wounded was 135. That of the Mexicans was computed at 1,200.

our batteries. The dismounted he had to go, but could make no stand, and expired in the following day. On the morning of the 14th of May the American troops captured the city of 60,000 inhabitants without a shot being fired. The British, however, who they killed and proceeded to the neighboring heights.

General Scott's order of battle on this occasion, which we regret we have not room to give, is a monument of his military skill and the sense of duty which he and his troops displayed. It was issued during the assault, and was both the exact representation of the various orders which he gave, and the basis of the success which followed. The bodies should have been taken, and the whole order was attributed to the
